Harnessing whole school potential for student successful learning

Towards a school leadership culture

► Introduction

School leadership has been high on the reform agenda for decades and even more since the radical and accelerated changes in the 21st century societies, pleading for fundamental reform in education. School leadership is indeed a key lever to implement transformation at institutional level, especially in the context of increasing autonomy given to schools in the 90s.

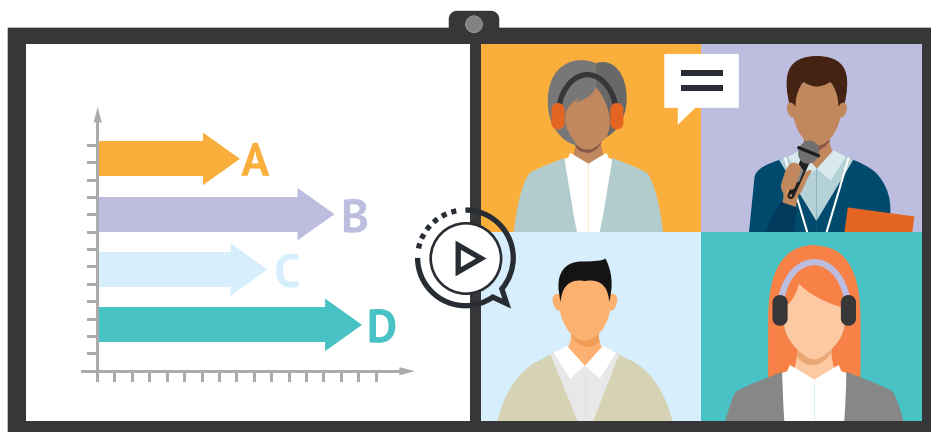

The Learning Leadership for Change (L2C) project is inspired by evidence from research in the area of school leadership, defined as a process of social influence (rather than authority), mobilising (not imposing) other efforts to reach objectives part of a broader vision (sometimes beyond the single school level).

School leadership differs from management first ensuring the stability of the institutional existing processes and resources. The school leadership is more about preparing the future, analysing the changes in the environment and proposing a way and a strategy for the school to evolve and ensure all students get prepared to the society they will be living into. It is thus related to student achievements in the sense that it indeed affects student's motivation, the quality of the school organization, and acts as a catalyst of the potential of the school staff, all factors in turn directly affecting students' learning.

The central aim of the L2C project is to move towards shared leadership, fostering a new culture in schools in which teachers, students and potentially parents willingly take responsibility for leadership in the school community. Evidence from research indeed shows that collaborative decision-making processes in schools can positively affect students' learning. The project then encourages the dissemination and mainstreaming of school leadership-innovative practices and effective networking through capacity-building (self-assessment, training and sharing of best practices) within three key areas linked to the strategic development of the school: STEM education, Innovative use of ICT in teaching and Digital Citizenship.

As with almost all facets of our lives, the Covid-19 pandemic is causing huge disruptions in education, with the closure of schools in many countries and children having to study at home. During this crisis, we have seen an incredible amount of large-scale efforts to use technology in support of remote learning. At the same time, this crisis has exposed the challenges for technology in education, including many inequities starting at the lack of access to computers and the internet. After participating in the L2C Online conference 2020, you will have a better understanding of how shared leadership in schools is a suited approach, especially, (while not only) in times of uncertainties, as a way to move forward collectively and in solidarity at the whole school level. We look forward to rich discussions with you and to drawing together lessons for the future from the implementation results!
